◆ ABOUT ME

I'm a Software Engineering student who never quite fit into one lane — equally drawn to writing code and to the conversations that happen before any code gets written. That instinct for understanding people first is what pulled me toward business development and consulting. It's also what I spent over eight years building as a competitive cheerleading coach, long before I had a name for it: reading people, earning their trust, and taking ownership when a result belongs to the whole team. I've since carried that instinct into coordinating a marketing team at Prudential, working directly with international clients, and building web products from the ground up. Few people bring coaching, code, and consulting into the same story — I do, and it's where I want to keep building.

PERSONAL NOTE

Long before any job title, I was the kid on the sidelines trying to get a team of teenagers to trust a routine they couldn't yet see working. Years later, that's still the part of any project I care about most — not the plan, but getting people to believe in it together.

WHAT SETS ME APART

- International Perspective
Navigating different cultures and expectations through freelance work with overseas clients.
- Leadership Through Coaching
Learned to lead people long before I learned to lead projects.
- Business & Technology Mindset
Equally fluent in client conversations and the technical decisions behind a solution.
- Client-Centric Communication
Start every project by listening first — solutions follow once the need is clear.
- Adaptability & Growth
Comfortable moving between code, coaching, and consulting without losing momentum.

"Helping people and organizations grow by combining technical thinking with human understanding."
